SEMIYOWEL, sém-té-vâd-êl, n. A consonant which makes an imperfect sound, or does not demand a total occlusion of the mouth. — Walker. A very great mistake, evincing a total ignorance of the very nature and powers of the simple sounds, and letters as their signs, and of the actual reason for calling some semivowels, some mutes, &c. The simple fact is, that the semivowels are so called, in contradistinction to the mutes, because the organs can be kept together, almost at pleasure, in pronouncing them, as, ef, el, em, en, er, es, ez, esh, ezh, ing, eah, eth; whereas, in pronouncing the mutes, as, ob, ed, eg, ek, ep, et, the organs cannot be kept together, at pleasure; and in pronouncing three of them, ek, ep, et, they cannot be kept together for the smallest space of time; and the attempt to prolong their sounds by keeping the organs together, produces absolute silence. The semivowels are therefore so called, as comparing them with the long vowels, â, â', â'', ô, ô', ô'', — J. K.

V.

V has two powers, expressed in modern English by two characters, V consonant and U vowel, which ought to be considered as two letters; but as they were long confounded while the two uses were annexed to one form, the old custom still continues to be followed.
U, the vowel, has two sounds, one clear, expressed at other times by eu as obscure; the other close, and approaching to the Italian u, or English oo, as obscure.
V, the consonant, has a sound nearly approaching to those of b and f. Its sound in English is uniform, and is never mute.—Todd's Johnson. Mere paper and

W.

W, dâb'l-u, n., is a letter of which the form is not to be found in the alphabets of the learned languages; though it is not improbable that by our w is expressed the sound of the Roman v, and the Eolick f. Both the form and sound are excluded from the languages derived from the Latin.—Todd's Johnson. Webster has taken from Mr. Sheridan the correct knowledge of the sound of the letter w, that it always marks a vowel sound. Its name has no connexion with its sound.—J. K.

W is sometimes improperly used in diphthongs as a vowel, for u, v, v, v; stew: the sound of w consonant, if it be a consonant, is uniform.—Todd's Johnson.

These assertions are very vague and absurd.—J. K.

the verb as a verb transitive, vt., and not at all as an active, intransitive verb, vi. Dr. Johnson's Dictionary marks it as merely a verb neuter, vn., an active intransitive verb. Every verb in language, by the way, is an active verb, except the verb to be, which, in every language, is the only neuter, or intransitive verb. Both explain it as a verb neuter, unless that, by implication, we are to take the participle whizzing, in the line which Dr. Webster gives from Dryden, in an active sense, as governing the word

Air, understood as the verb cut governs "the liquid way"—

"It flew, and whizzing, cut the liquid way"—

It flew, and whizzing (the air), cut the liquid way;—

which would destroy the measure of the verse, every line in poetry being a verse. I have presumed to give the verb an active, transitive signification, as above.—J. K.

WORM, wórm, vt. To drive by slow and secret means. To deprive a dog of something, nobody knows what, under his tongue, which is said to prevent him, nobody knows how, from running mad.— [Whoever was the author of this additional and satirical no-explanation of the term "Worm," as applied to a dog, he has only shown his own absurdity, by the positive assertions he has made of the non-existence of an operation of which he is totally ignorant. The fact is, that there is a round, white, soft nerve, of about an inch and nearly a half long, that lies not far from the point of the under part of a dog's tongue, which the compiler of this dictionary has often removed; and the positive effect of which removal is, that though the dog may be bitten by a mad dog, he will not bite any person; but I am not certain whether his being wormed, as it is called, will prevent him from going mad. Take a puppy, or a small dog, between your knees,—the back of his head must of course be undermost; and take firm hold of the point of his tongue with a towel, to prevent the tongue from slipping through your fingers; then, with a sharp pointed penknife, or a lancet, make a small longitudinal incision of the skin that lies over the nerve, sufficient to uncover it, and allow you to immediately put a wire, or single prong fork, crosswise under the nerve. Not removing the fork, then with your right hand thumb, and first finger, with or without a cloth, move the fork along from you till you uncover the nerve at the extreme point from you, and then lay aside the fork, and with your thumb and finger, take hold of the end of the nerve which you have uncovered, and draw it towards you, and you will immediately free the end next to you, and draw the whole nerve out. A puppy so wormed will not tear every thing that comes in his way; and a large dog, being properly held by an assistant, may be wormed in the same way, and with the same ease.— J. K.]

X.

X, eks', n. Is a letter, which, though found in Saxon word, begins no word in the English language. An attempt has lately been made to introduce from the French, the last three or four words: two seem to have been once received; and the sea-term is yet in use. — Todd's Johnson — which contains only the words Xebex, Xenodochy, Xerophagy, and Xylography. The other words which have been given have been more recently adopted in the language. — J. K.

X, eks. The numeral letter for ten.

XANTHID, zán-thíd, n. } A compound of xantho-

XANTHIDE, zán-thíd, n. } gene and a metal.

XANTHOGENE, zán-thó-gé-né, n. The base of a new acid, from a solution of pure potassa and bisulphurett of carbon, and hydrogen. It is named from the yellow colour of its compounds.

XEBEC, zé-bék, n. A small three-masted vessel, navigated in the Mediterranean.

XENODOCHY, zé-nó-dók-é, n. Reception of strangers: hospitality.

ZÉROCŒLYRIUM, zé-ro-cól-lé-úm, n. A dry collyrium, or eyesalve.

XEROMYRUM, zér-ó-mý-rúm, n. A dry ointment.

XEROPHAGY, zé-róf-á-gé, n. Dry food; subsistence on dry victuals. A fast so named, observed by the primitive Christians.

XEROPHTHALMY, zé-róf-thál-mé, n. A dry red soreness, or itching of the eyes, without swelling or a discharge of the humours.

XIPHIAS, zíf-é-ás, n. The swordfish.

XIPHOID, zíf-é-óid, n. The xiphoid, or cartiform cartilage, is a small cartilage placed at the bottom of the breastbone. [on wood.]

XYLOGRAPHY, zíl-óg-ráf-é, n. The art of engraving

Y.

Y, éi', n. At the beginning of words, is commonly taken, though perhaps erroneously, for a consonant; at the end, and when it follows a consonant, it is a vowel, and has the sound of i. It is used at the end of words, and whenever two i's would come together; and in words derived from the Greek, to express the u. Y was much used by the Saxons, whence y is found for i in the old English writers. — Johnson's and all other Dictionaries. I have demonstrated already, in my Exposition of the Principles of Speech, that it is a vowel and a diphthong.

Y is in old English sometimes prefixed as an increasing syllable to preterites and passive participles of verbs. It seems borrowed from the Saxon augmentum of the preterite.

YACHT, é-ét, n. A ship for carrying passengers.

There is a peculiar, and fine-sounding diphthong, terminating a number of Hebrew words, which I have marked by uniting in the middle, and last syllable of many words, the vowels ai—the sounds being ai—ái ending in fact in ai. The English have not such a diphthong
